SENATOR CUDABACK: Senator Chambers, you have five minutes, on the...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: Thank you, Senator Thompson. Thank you, Mr. President. And I would like to further elaborate on what Senator Cunningham was asking me. The question he asked is legitimate. The example he gives is appropriate to try to advance his cause. But if I had to reach out and find such an out of the ordinary situation to support my case, it would let me know that I don't really have a case. What I need to do in forming my judgment to determine how I will vote is to consider cases of the kind that Senator Bourne and others have presented to us, which are likely to happen to the ordinary run-of-the-mill employee. We know that there are going to be wrongdoers everywhere, even in the church, even among the curia. Judges, lawyers, doctors, preachers, priests, rabbis, you name it. If it's a human being doing it, there are going to be wrongdoers among them. But the first thing that we are told, don't judge all of them by the bad apples. We're always told that when there's some group, some profession, or some entity that can be considered better than everybody else. Instead of judging them by a higher standard, because where much is known, much is required, we say, since they are such important people, don't punish them like everybody else. I think my colleagues have the following attitude. It's like some societies where at the very top is the Brahmin, who has all of the privileges. There is...look at it like a pyramid, a wide base, and the apex. Those who make up the great majority of the populace are at the bottom. They have the fewest rights, the least consideration. Some of them are even considered outcasts or pariahs. The higher up you proceed on that pyramid, the fewer people you're going to find in those classifications, the more rights they're going to have, the better they are treated, until you get to the top where the Brahmin is, and that person is exempt from all laws. That person is above the law. I'd like to ask Senator Vrtiska a question. His answers might help me out...

SENATOR CUDABACK: Would you...

SENATOR CHAMBERS: ...as far as making my point. Senator
